Prostate Cancer Affects More Than Just Men

By: Bradley Foster

Sometimes partners overlook their own needs when caring for their husbands. A coach who has counselled many men and women through the ordeal has some advice for the partners of men with PC.

Having experienced prostate cancer first hand I can attest to the shock of the diagnosis, the fear of staring death in the face, the anger of "why me?", the grief of possibly having my life shortened, the sadness of realizing how alone I am facing the uncertainties of treatment and recovery.

Prostate cancer is a disease that affects not only its victims but those close to them. It’s a cruel ordeal for men, but it’s often made worse for their partners when they refuse to talk about it. Partners experience the same feelings of anger, fear and grief as their husbands, but when men refuse to openly discuss their feelings, their partners also feel helpless, frustrated, resentful and guilty. Unresolved feelings between a couple can seriously impair the communication in their relationship at a time when they need each other the most.

As we know, most men avoid talking about personal issues and even the most willing of us shut up tighter than clams when it has to do with our sexual health. To compensate we men get busy with technical matters and are usually willing to discuss the merits of surgery versus radiation or laparoscopic versus brachytherapy treatments as if we were talking about lawn mowers at Canadian Tire. When hit by the careening bus of irrationality and uncertainly, we retreat to the safety of logic and a rational choice of technology.

So what can you do if your spouse has opted to go through prostate cancer hell without you? Seeing cancer as a challenge to overcome rather than as an insidious disease eating away at your spouse is a good start. My advice is to support yourself and realize that thousands of women in Canada have gone through the same test as you. At times the dark thoughts and feelings can be overwhelming but try to take one day at a time and realize that with time things will become clearer and less uncertain.

Many prostate cancer support groups, (like PCCN Calgary) offer help and advice to the partners of men with prostate cancer. It is important and advice to the partners of men with prostate cancer. It is important to talk to someone knowledgeable who can help you work through feelings that come up for you. Health care professionals, therapists, coaches, or religious leaders are there to help support you in your time of need. Your doctor or local hospital may also be able to direct you to someone who will listen. Don't think twice to reach out.

Wanted - A Few Good Men and Women

Over the last 15 years PCCN Calgary has grown to be a well-respected organization with a reputation for providing education and support to men and their families dealing with prostate cancer.

- We currently send the Digital Examiner to almost 1000 subscribers.
- We have one general meeting per month, a Warriors meeting and two sets of smaller peer group meetings.
- We promote awareness both of our organization and of the need for early detection at trade fairs, mall displays and at presentations to service clubs and corporations.

The next few years promise to be very exciting for PCCN Calgary. In November we created a strategic plan to set out some goals and strategies. The Board of Directors will play a central role in this important work.

We are looking for people who are passionate about our organization and the role we can play in the fight against prostate cancer, enthusiastic and willing to share their story and their time. Please consider putting your name forward as a board member at our Annual General Meeting on May 11.

Comparison study of open and laparoscopic surgery found few differences in outcome

MONDAY, Feb. 22 (HealthDay News) -- Results are similar for men with prostate cancer whether they have open surgery or laparoscopic surgery, a new study has found.

Currently, open radical prostatectomy (ORP) is considered the standard treatment but the use of laparoscopic radical prostatectomy (LRP), with or without robotic assistance, is becoming more widespread.

In the new study, researchers at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City compared ORP and LRP outcomes in nearly 6,000 men, age 66 or older, with localized prostate cancer.

After they adjusted for patient and tumor characteristics, the researchers found no differences in the rates of general medical/surgical complications, genital/urinary/bowel complications, or in use of postoperative radiation and/or androgen deprivation.

Patients in the LRP group had a 35 percent shorter hospital stay and a lower rate of bladder neck/urethral obstruction, the study authors noted.

"All men considering radical prostatectomy should be clearly informed about the differences between the two techniques and similarities in their expected outcomes, and make treatment decisions in collaboration with an experienced surgeon," Dr. William T. Lowrance and colleagues wrote in their report, which is published in the Feb. 22 issue of the Journal of Urology.
